as much as possible in her wake, so as to pick up a buoy or small boat when veered astern from the ship for your assistance, a deepsea leadline or small hawser is generally used for this purpose; as soon as you have picked it up and secured it to your boat, she is walked up alongside by all hands on board the ship clapping on the line veered astern. Q. How would you tow a spar A. The smallest end first. Q. What preparation would you make if in charge of a boat under sail, before going alongside a ship, and what guide have you for properly laying your boat alongside the gangway 1 A. Much depends upon the judgment of the coxswain in going alongside a ship; the general rule, however, is to get the mainyard end on, but this must greatly depend upon whether the ship is in a tide way or not, or whether the boat is light or heavily laden. In coming alongside, unship the bowsprit, see the boat has been properly baled out, fenders out, slings, if possible, should be hooked, and everything ready for the boat to be hoisted up if you know she is not to remain down, and always remember that a heavily laden boat carries her way much longer than a light boat. Q. How would you haul a boat up on a beach, or launch one A. All boats ought to be fitted with a hole in the fore foot, about 1 in. Before leaving the ship to haul a boat up on a beach to scrub her bottom, or for any other purpose, see a boats anchor and a lufftackle in the boat, place her thwarts or stretchers under her keel, bury her anchor in the beach well up, bend a ropesend to the ring of it, and make a long strop, so as to allow sufficient drift to hook the tack. The Civil War attracted to the USMC a handful of young men who were natural leaders. These men then trained another cohort of talented, tenacious leaders, who, in turn, molded the men who led the Marine Corps into the twentieth century.
